1. Letter From the Secretary General

Dear Participants,

First of all, it is my utmost pleasure to serve you as the Secretary General for the first edition of ION Model United Nations Conference. I am more than proud for making this conference happen with my colleagues and looking forward to see every attendee.

Essentially MUN's are great opportunities to increase your consultation capabilities, your assertiveness and understand how policy is implemented. I can honestly state that MUN impacted my perspective on life in a positive way. For this reason, it is my mission to transfer the experiences I have gained to the new generation and to ensure that they affect them in the same way.

Lastly as the executive team, in order to put this conference together we really plod away. We really worked hard to burn the soul of IONMUN26. And do not forget ION is the timeless voices for peace.

Sincerely,

Doruk Sapmaz

2. Letter From the Under-Secretary General

Dear Delegates,

It is with great delight that I, the Under-Secretary General of the Imperial Court Committee, welcome you all to IONMUN'26. Writing my letters as a USG always brings me joy and a sense of honor, and I wish all of you the same.

I would like to thank some special people who have made this incredible conference possible and invited me to make a committee: the Executive Team. Firstly, Mustafa, with his academic knowledge and discipline, seeing him in the Exec never surprises me. Doruk, he is such an upbeat person and always handles things so smoothly; I hope everything in this conference works out in accordance with their wishes. My Academic Assistant, Ata Yankı, is probably everyone's dream Academic Team member. I would like to thank him for his efforts on this guide and wish him a very pleasant MUN journey.

Although our agenda in this committee is Deliberations on Foreign Influence and the Future of Japan, we will be covering a lot more than that. In the timeline we chose, there is so much to discuss and work on, from civilians' rights to foreign affairs. We included a significant amount of information in this guide, and I advise you to read it thoroughly, but you will have to do your own research regarding your allocated role.

If you do have any questions regarding the agenda, procedure, or MUN in general, feel free to contact me through the Email address or my phone number, which I have placed below.

Sincerely,
Nehir Doğu

3. Letter From the Academic Assistant

Honourable Secretariat, Esteemed Participants and Fellow Academic Team Members;

I, as the Academic Assistant of the Imperial Court Committee, welcome you all to IONMUN'26. Greetings everyone, I am Ata Yankı KILINÇ, and I will be present as the Academic Assistant of our Imperial Court Committee.

There are some basic things that the representatives shall bear in mind during the preparation time for the committee. Our committee is a special committee that will have a different procedure than the other special, GA or crisis committees. Actually, our name shall not deceive you, but we are not a court committee. Also, our study guide is really essential for you to understand the Imperial Court and its duties. You may find our procedure in the eighth topic.

I can not wait patiently until the conference. See you all then. You may contact me via

Sincerely,

Ata Yankı KILINÇ

4. Introduction to the Committee

In order to understand the committee better, this introduction part is essential, as we are going to give essential information about the committee and its duties.

a. Imperial Court

Front view of Kyoto Imperial Palace

The Imperial Court of Japan in Kyoto from 794 AD till 1912 was the nominal ruling government of Japan. Then it was moved to Tokyo, whose former name was Edo, and integrated into the Meiji government.

Mainly, the Imperial Court consisted of:

- Chancellor /Chief Minister - Daijo-daijin
- Minister of Left - Sadaijin
- Minister of Right - Udaijin
- Minister of Center - Naidaijin
- Major Counselor - Dainagon
- Middle Counselor - Chunagon
- Minor Counselor - Shonagon

Daijo-kan (Council of State), which is also referred to as the Imperial Court, was mainly composed of these people.

Bear these people and their names in your mind because it will be essential in the next sub-topic, which is the power structure.

Kyoto was actually perfect for a government for this era. Kyoto's identity as a political, economic, and cultural centre started to be challenged in the post-1185 era with the rise of the shogunate system, which gradually seized governance from the emperor.

b. Power Structure in the Court

We mentioned the power structure before, but only the main roles. In the court in Kyoto, there are more roles other than the Daijo-kans' roles.

You may also find these roles again below:

Mainly, the Imperial Court consisted of:

- Chancellor /Chief Minister - Daijo-daijin
- Minister of Left - Sadaijin
- Minister of Right - Udaijin
- Minister of Center - Naidaijin
- Major Counselor - Dainagon
- Middle Counselor - Chunagon
- Minor Counselor - Shonagon

The Imperial Palace in Kyoto operated under an extremely stratified hierarchy known as the ritsuryō system, which was inspired by Confucianism. At its core, there was a dual structure between the highest ritual authority and the executive branch; over time, this structure evolved into a system in which court nobles (kuge) administered the government, while powerful military shoguns controlled the actual national power.

One of the other main roles in the court was the emperor, as the emperor sat at the apex of the court and was regarded, in theory, as the supreme sovereign and the absolute center of political and divine authority. His or her role was to issue imperial decrees and serve as the chief ritual figure, performing sacred ceremonies and embodying the legitimacy of the state. He also held the exclusive Senior First Rank of court nobility.

And then, as we mentioned before in this part of the study guide, the Council of State (Daijō-kan) came into play. Below the Emperor was the supreme executive organ of the government, the Council of State (Daijō-kan). This council managed the centralized bureaucracy and was composed of the following core ministers, collectively referred to as senior nobles or kugyō. You may find the main roles in the Senate again and some of their roles below:

- Chancellor /Chief Minister - Daijō-daijin
  - Minister of Left - Sadaijin
  - Minister of Right - Udaijin
  - Minister of Center - Naidaijin
  - Major Counselor - Dainagon
  - Middle Counselor - Chunagon
  - Minor Counselor - Shonagon
- Chancellor (Daijō-daijin): The highest official, often a mentor or regent to the Emperor.
  - Minister of the Left (Sadaijin) & Minister of the Right (Udaijin): The primary policymakers and operational leaders of the government.
  - Major Counselor (Dainagon): Advisors who drafted imperial edicts and reviewed petitions.

After these, it is time for the eight ministries. You may find them below with their Japanese names.

- Center - Nakatsukasa-shō
- Ceremonial - Shikibu-shō
- Civil Administration - Jibu-shō
- Popular Affairs - Minbu-shō
- War - Hyōbu-shō
- Justice - Gyōbu-shō
- Treasury - Ōkura-shō
- Imperial Household - Kunai-shō

Beneath the Council of State sat the eight core ministries that carried out the day-to-day administrative tasks of the government. Notable examples include the Ministry of Central Affairs (handling the Emperor's personal life and imperial decrees), the Ministry of Civil Administration (managing provincial governors), and the Ministry of Ceremonial.

Although in theory it was based on merit, during the Heian period (794–1185), access to these high-level ministerial and bureaucratic positions (ika) was largely restricted by hereditary succession.

The Fujiwara Clan is an important point to show in this part. Over the centuries, the Fujiwara clan successfully monopolized power by marrying their daughters into the imperial family. Regents (Sesshō and Kanpaku) must also be mentioned here. To secure their control over the court, Fujiwara leaders made the regency a hereditary position. A Sesshō ruled on behalf of a child emperor, while a Kanpaku served as an advisor and regent to an adult emperor and effectively governed the country in the emperor's name.

And then one of the most important parts comes: the Shogunate.

Starting in the late 12th century with the Kamakura shogunate, the actual power structure evolved drastically. Military leaders (shōgun) established their own governments, eventually shifting the true center of rule to Edo (present-day Tokyo).

Despite this military dominance, the imperial court in Kyoto retained immense symbolic importance. Shoguns still relied on the Kyoto court to legitimize their rule, and the military governments strictly regulated the court nobility to prevent them from staging rebellions.

This dual-authority structure ended with the Meiji Restoration in 1868, when the capital and the imperial court were relocated to Tokyo, officially blending traditional imperial symbolism with a modern centralized government.

Shogun is a title granted by the Emperor that means commander-in-chief. The bakufu (warrior government) set up by the Tokugawa controlled a network of daimyo (regional lords), who in turn ruled relatively autonomously over their respective domains that had been granted by the Shogun.

5. Historical Background

Now, in order to understand our committee better, we may look to the historical background of our committee. In this part, we will look at the Edo Period, the Policy of Sakoku, and the Power Struggle Between the Emperor and the Shogun.

a. Edo Period

The Edo Period is one of the most important periods of the Japanese Empire's history. It was also known as the Tokugawa period, which was between 1600 or 1603 and 1868 in the history of Japan. Between these years, the country was under the control and rule of the Tokugawa Shogunate, “which was a militaristic government established by Tokugawa Ieyasu after the victory of the Battle of Sekigahara, which ended the civil wars of the Sengoku Period following the collapse of the Ashikaga Shogunate,” and some 300 regional daimyo, which also was referred as feudal lords.

It emerged from the chaos of the Sengoku period and the Battle of Sekigahara, which led to the fall of the Ashikaga Shogunate. This chaos had a lot of effect on the upcoming Edo period, as big changes happened because of this chaos. The Edo period was characterized by prolonged peace and stability, urbanization and economic growth, strict social order, isolationist foreign policies, and popular enjoyment of arts and culture.

After the Battle of Sekigahara, Ieyasu became the shōgun, and the Tokugawa clan governed Japan from Edo Castle in the eastern city of Edo (Tokyo) along with the daimyō lords of the samurai class.

Other than the war, there are more reasons why the Edo period started.

Prior to Edo, Japan suffered more than a century of civil war (1467–1568) known as the Sengoku period (“country at war”) with regional warlords battling each other for supremacy. From about 1560–1590, the various domains were united through the efforts of two powerful daimyo (regional rulers), Oda Nobunaga (1534–82) and Toyotomi Hideyoshi (1536–98). After Nobunaga was assassinated in 1582, Hideyoshi strove to consolidate control and stability, and secure his own succession. However, his failed attempts to invade Korea in 1592–1598 dwindled his resources. His son was too young to succeed him when he died of illness in 1598. At this point, Hideyoshi’s former allies competed for leadership. Tokugawa Ieyasu (1542–1616) emerged the strongest, and completed Japan’s unification under Tokugawa hegemony.

Ieyasu stamped out the last remnants of Hideyoshi’s family and retainers when he occupied Osaka Castle in 1615, marking the official start of the Edo/Tokugawa period.

One of the main policies of the Edo Period was the Policy of Sakoku...

b. Policy of Sakoku

Portuguese traders first arrived in Japan in 1543, marking the beginning of a period of nearly 100 years of contact between Japanese and Europeans, many of whom were Christian missionaries. The first to arrive were traders, who brought firearms that transformed methods of warfare in Japan, tipping the scales in favor of the daimyo who quickly mastered this new technology. Later visitors included missionaries, such as the now-sainted Francis Xavier, who arrived in 1549 as a passenger on a Chinese boat. Many of the missionaries were aggressive converts, bringing several daimyo and thousands of commoners into the faith. The Christians angered the shogunate when they involved themselves in political conflicts, posing a real threat to the Shogun’s control. In 1614, an official judgment on the subversiveness of Christianity was published stating that Christians were trying to take over Japan, and that their religion taught them to:

“contravene governmental regulations, traduce Shinto, calumniate the True Law [Buddhism], destroy righteousness, corrupt goodness”—in short, to subvert the native Japanese, the Buddhist, and the Confucian foundations of the social order.<sup>1</sup>

The Shogun banned Christianity, expelled missionaries from the country, and began to persecute those who had converted and refused to renounce the faith.

c. The Power Struggle Between the Emperor and the Shogun

For nearly 700 years, Japan was defined by a unique dual-power system. The Emperor remained the ceremonial head of state and a divine, revered figure, while the Shogun (military dictator) held absolute, de facto control over the military, finances, and foreign policy.

This system emerged after the establishment of the first shogunate in 1192, when military leaders gained political dominance while preserving the Emperor as a symbol of legitimacy. Although the Emperor retained immense cultural and religious authority, real executive power rested with the Shogun, who governed through a network of regional feudal lords known as daimyō. In return for land and protection, the daimyō pledged military service and loyalty to the Shogun.

The dual-power structure created long periods of internal stability, particularly under the Tokugawa Shogunate (1603–1868), but it also limited the Emperor's ability to influence national policy. Political legitimacy became divided between symbolic imperial authority and practical military rule, creating an enduring tension within Japan's governing system.

This balance ultimately collapsed during the Meiji Restoration of 1868, when supporters of the Emperor overthrew the Tokugawa Shogunate and restored executive authority to the imperial throne. The abolition of the shogunate marked the end of Japan's feudal era and initiated rapid political, military, and economic modernization, transforming Japan into a centralized nation-state capable of competing with Western powers.

6. Foreign Influence

Despite over two centuries of the Sakoku ("Closed Country") policy, foreign influence increasingly challenged Japan during the nineteenth century. While the Tokugawa Shogunate continued to restrict most foreign contact, global developments and Western imperial expansion made complete isolation increasingly difficult.

Throughout this period, increasing Western imperialism made Japanese officials hold on much more tightly to the Sangoku Policy. Japanese officials feared that Japan could become the next target of unequal treaties or colonization. They were afraid because European powers and the United States expanded their presence throughout Asia. Also, the British victory in the First Opium War (1839–1842) demonstrated China's military weakness against Western powers.

Another important topic to mention here is that foreign trade was limited. But it was not entirely banned, as under Sakoku, the Dutch were the only Europeans permitted to trade, confined to the artificial island of Dejima in Nagasaki. The trade limitations were much more strict to the western countries, as they had great influence over the world that made the Japanese official fear. Trade was also maintained under strict regulation with China, Korea, the Ryukyu Kingdom, and the Ainu through designated channels. Although limited, these contacts allowed Western scientific knowledge (Rangaku, or "Dutch Learning") to enter Japan.

To talk about rangaku more thoroughly, we can easily sum it as Dutch Learning. Dutch merchants introduced Western medicine, astronomy, navigation, engineering, and military science. Scholars translated Dutch books and studied European technology despite official restrictions. This created a growing debate over whether Japan should modernize or preserve traditional institutions.

Also, the increasing foreign pressure in the region led the Japanese Empire to go deeper in their shell. Russian, British, French, and American vessels increasingly appeared near Japanese waters seeking trade and supplies. The arrival of foreign ships exposed the limitations of Japan's coastal defenses. Many Japanese officials questioned whether continued isolation was sustainable. This isolation officially ended with the Treaty of Kanagawa.

Until the Treaty of Kanagawa, foreign pressure intensified divisions within Japan. Supporters of Sakoku argued that isolation preserved Japanese sovereignty and protected traditional culture. Reformers believed limited engagement with foreign powers and military modernization were necessary to avoid China's fate. These disagreements weakened the authority of the Tokugawa Shogunate and strengthened calls for greater Imperial involvement in national affairs.

7. Treaty of Kanagawa

Treaty of Kanagawa was an agreement signed on March 31, 1854, between Japan and the United States. It marked the end of Japan's more than 200 years of relative isolation (sakoku) and opened the country to limited contact and trade with the West.

The arrival of Commodore Matthew C. Perry and his fleet of American warships in 1853–1854, commonly known in Japan as the "Black Ships," marked a turning point in Japanese history. The United States sought to establish diplomatic relations and secure access to Japanese ports for its expanding commercial and naval interests in the Pacific. At the time, Japan was governed by the Tokugawa shogunate, which had enforced the sakoku (closed country) policy for over two centuries, severely restricting foreign contact and trade. Confronted with the overwhelming military superiority of the U.S. Navy and the threat of force, the shogunate chose to negotiate rather than resist.

The negotiations resulted in the Treaty of Kanagawa, signed on 31 March 1854. Under the treaty, Japan agreed to open the ports of Shimoda and Hakodate to American vessels for refueling, supplies, and repairs. The agreement also guaranteed the humane treatment of shipwrecked American sailors and permitted the United States to station a consul in Japan to oversee diplomatic relations. Although the treaty did not establish unrestricted commercial trade, it laid the diplomatic foundation for later agreements, particularly the Harris Treaty of 1858, which introduced broader trade and commercial privileges.

The Treaty of Kanagawa had profound consequences for Japan's political and social development. It effectively ended Japan's centuries-long policy of isolation, exposing the country to increasing Western political, economic, and military influence. Many Japanese viewed the shogunate's acceptance of foreign demands as a sign of weakness, causing a significant decline in its domestic legitimacy. The treaty also encouraged other Western powers to demand similar agreements, leading to a series of unequal treaties that granted foreign nations special legal privileges and limited Japan's control over its own trade policies. Growing dissatisfaction with the shogunate's inability to resist foreign pressure became a major factor contributing to the Meiji Restoration of 1868, which overthrew the Tokugawa government, restored imperial authority, and initiated Japan's rapid modernization and industrialization.

8. Key Issues

In the late times of the Tokugawa Shogunate in and for Japan, the key issues were internal conflicts and tradition and modernization. As we mentioned before in our study guide, both the officials and the people were separated into groups on many topics. Below you may find more details about the key issues in the last days of the Tokugawa Shogunate.

a. Internal Conflicts

During the final decades of the Tokugawa Shogunate, Japan experienced growing internal instability. Economic hardship, political rivalries, and disagreements over foreign policy undermined the authority of the shogunate and divided Japanese society.

In the last days of the Tokugawa Shogunate, there was a lot of political rivalry, as we mentioned before in the topic “The Power Struggle Between the Emperor and the Shogun”. The most significant conflict was the struggle for authority between the Tokugawa Shogunate and the Imperial Court in Kyoto. While the Shogun exercised political and military power, many influential daimyō and court nobles argued that the Emperor should reclaim executive authority to better protect Japan from foreign threats.

Another main internal conflict was about the Sonno Joi Movement. The Sonnō Jōi ("Revere the Emperor, Expel the Barbarians") movement gained support among samurai, court nobles, and several powerful domains. Although united in opposing foreign influence, supporters differed on how Japan should achieve national strength. Some demanded the immediate expulsion of foreigners, while others believed modernization was necessary before confronting Western powers.

Another active and crucial topic in these times was the domain rivalries. What we mean by the domain is the Satsuma and Chōshū domains. In those days, the Satsuma Domain and Chōshū Domain became the leading opponents of the shogunate. Initially rivals, they later formed the Satsuma–Chōshū Alliance, creating a powerful political and military coalition against Tokugawa rule. Although they were not the only domains alive and active at the time, others remained loyal to the shogunate. This also increased the possibility of a civil war.

Also, the public was in unrest in economic and social ways. Poor harvests and famines caused rising food prices. Many samurai faced financial hardship because their fixed stipends lost value. Peasant uprisings and urban protests became more frequent due to taxation and economic inequality. Merchant wealth increased, challenging the traditional social hierarchy in which merchants ranked below samurai despite often being wealthier.

As aforementioned, the debate over modernization divided both the officials and the public as reformists and traditionalists. Conservatives sought to preserve the feudal order and Japan's traditional institutions. Reformers advocated military, economic, and governmental modernization to prevent Japan from suffering the same fate as China after the Opium Wars.

b. Tradition and Modernization

During the application period of the Sakoku Policy, neither military nor social life found a way to develop modern tools. But by the mid-nineteenth century, Japan faced an existential dilemma. The arrival of Western powers and their superior military technology exposed the weaknesses of the Tokugawa Shogunate's isolationist policies. Many Japanese leaders recognized that remaining isolated risked military defeat or colonization, while others feared that adopting Western ideas would undermine Japan's cultural identity and political traditions.

The Japanese leaders were divided into two main groups during the tradition and modernization question was still a main topic in the debate.

First up were traditionalists. Traditionalists believed Japan should preserve the social and political order that had maintained stability for over two centuries. These traditionalists defended the sakoku policy and restricted foreign influence as they were afraid to lose both their culture and independence. Their position on the topic of preserving the samurai class was to preserve it. They also aimed to preserve the feudal system that Europe destroyed years before. They also protected Shinto and Confucian values from Western cultural and religious influence, resisted unequal treaties and foreign interference, and supported the slogan Sonnō Jōi ("Revere the Emperor, Expel the Barbarians").

Now the reformers or reformists. Reformers argued that selective modernization was essential for Japan's survival. Their main positions on topics were:

- Adopt Western military technology and modern weapons.
- Reform the economy through industrial development.
- Improve education by studying Western science and engineering.
- Modernize government institutions to strengthen national unity.
- Engage in controlled international trade and diplomacy.

For the Imperial Court, this debate was closely tied to political legitimacy. Many nobles believed that only a restoration of imperial authority could unite Japan and guide modernization without sacrificing national identity. Others feared that rapid reforms would erode centuries-old traditions and destabilize society. These competing visions ultimately contributed to the collapse of the Tokugawa Shogunate and the Meiji Restoration of 1868.

9. *Committee Procedure

Since our committee is a special one, the procedure may change or vary depending on the situation, but the ground and important parts of the procedure are present in this guide.

Points in Crisis Procedure

Due to the nature of the committee, directives will be the main focus of the committee's progression, and subsequently, some parts of the crisis procedure will also be implemented.

Roll Call

To state your presence during a roll call, when your allocation is called out, you should say 'I' or 'Present'. The roll call is taken at the beginning of each session.

Tour de Table

Tour de Table is an introduction, similar to the opening speech in the General Assembly(GA) committees. You can talk about whatever you want; You can introduce yourself, talk about your plans, or give out your opinions about the current situation. Tour de Table gets taken at the beginning of each session, after the roll call.

Unmoderated Caucus

Unlike GA committees, Unmoderated caucuses are the main caucus you will have. Since unmoderated caucuses are the only caucus where the delegates are not chaired, they can stand up, make plans, and most importantly, write directives.

7.3) Directives

Personal Directives

Personal directives are directives that include only you and the actions you will be taking. So the actions that you take will be completed by only you and the people under your command. Now, there is a format for writing and sending directives. Firstly, you need to fill the 'From' and 'To' parts. The 'From' part will include your name, and the 'To' part will include the department you are sending the directives to, which is Related Authorities (RA) or the Related Department (RD). Then, you need to write the real time in real life and the date in the committee, which will be regularly changing with time updates and changing events. Lastly, you need to write the type of the directive as a headline. After the format, the real directive begins. In order to fulfill the directive's potential to the maximum, you need to be answering all WH questions (What, Who, Where, Why, When, and How) during the process. It is up to the writer to merge all categories, but it is encouraged that you write them separately to make things easier for the crisis team to understand your directive fully.

Here is an example:

From: Mr. Greer Date:19/09/1962

To: RA Time: 12.15

Personal Directive

What: a directive to find out who organized this operation using a spy

When: As soon as possible

Who: who they will choose; myself and they would have the skills we need in that topic

Why: to find out who organised this operation

How:

Firstly, with the power of the CIA, I will research the terrorist groups who have power in the area because if there is an event in the world, the CIA is able to get info about that operation. The CIA will use its own ways to research the terrorist groups. They will use spies who get an education in the USA and work for at least 15 years in the area for the CIA, have a good relationship with terrorist groups in those areas, and have a phone signal jammer, and they will look Asian. They will collect the information, and on 1 April 2024, if they have them, they will use their secret bases and secret phones that can't be detected by phone radar. They will get in contact at 12.00 am. If they don't have secret bases, the government of the USA will design a sports match, and the spy will bet on this match, and they will win that bet. Because the match will be fraudulent, after they get money, they will design a secret safe house. And sent infos for us. After they got info from the terrorist group IF they didn't do anything. We will start to research the government of China. The same people who get an education in the USA and work at least 15 years in the area for the CIA and have a good relationship with the government of China have a phone radar jammer, and they will look Asian. In addition, they can sacrifice themselves for our government. They will have poison that can kill in a second; if they are arrested or caught, they will use it. After getting information from inside, they will use the same ways to communicate, but the date will be 3 April 2024. After the CIA gets information, they will send a report to me, and depending on the situation, I will have journalists from all over the world make news that will criticize them in the press at the same time. An attitude will be taken against them in the whole world, especially in my own country.

Joint Directives

These directives are similar to personal directives and follow the same format, but they include more than one delegate. The only difference is that you need to add the delegate's name, who is included in the “from” part, and have their signatures at the end.

Committee Directives

A committee directive is a directive that is written together and approved collectively by the entire committee.

Intelligence Directive

An Intelligence Directive is a directive that you send to the committee academy to learn about your current stats, whereabouts, or status. This directive is in a question format you can use to learn information for your other directives.

Crucial Points in Writing an Efficient Directive

Directives let you create a space for any action imaginable in the realm of this committee. It is also important to note that directives will be the anchor in shaping the flow of the committee, so here are some crucial points in ensuring the efficiency of a directive:

- For every action that is written in the directive, it has to answer all the WH questions.
- The longer and more detailed, the better.
- Drawing a doctrine, charging plan, or strategy may significantly increase the directive's precision and effectiveness. The success rate of the directive will grow in proportion to how clear your action and directive are.
- Do not use abbreviations such as "etc."; instead, detail the directive explicitly.
- WH- questions are not necessarily broken into paragraphs (one can write the directive like a book), but if you are a beginner, doing so will dramatically improve the quality of your directive; hence, it is strongly recommended.
- Since you are in a Special Committee, you need to implement your ideas to the other delegates, but do not be hesitant to ask for help from other merchants or your chair; you are all in this together.
- If you are positive that there is no imposter in the cabinet, directives should be written separately because it will be much faster. That way, eight people will be working on eight different tasks, and it will save quite a lot of time.
- Precise information, like the availability of the resources you are going to use, the amount, and your way of getting them, is critical; do not forget to write it down.
- If needed, fake names can be used for strategic persons in the directives too.
